

Ever since ancient times man has tried to protect himself from the more serious effects of mechanical violence. The use of primitive types of armour can be traced at least as far back as about 1500 B.C. This indicates that people at that time must have had some idea about one of the basic principles for injury prevention. They obviously understood that the serious effects of a concentrated load could be reduced by distributing the forces over a larger area.